

Financial Markets Daily

Main drivers for the financial markets today...

- Stock markets higher, government bond yields down, and USD mixed. Optimism about upcoming rate cuts in an environment of favorable economic data and good expectations about the earnings season (especially on tech), with an additional tailwind from news of mergers and acquisitions
- In China, 1- and 5-year prime loan rates were left unchanged at 3.45% and 4.20%, respectively. The decision was in line with the central bank's unchanged stance announced last week, albeit with speculation that they will be adjusted lower in the future
- No further economic data today in the US. In Mexico, the banking sector survey of expectations. Later, Japan's central bank will announce its monetary policy decision
- Market attention on economic data, including 4Q23 GDP in the US that we forecast at 1.9% y/y (consensus: 2.0%), along with PMI indicators in the same country, the Eurozone, and United Kingdom. Additionally, the ECB monetary policy decision
- In the latter front, central bank decisions also in Malaysia, Canada, Norway, Turkey, and South Africa. No speeches from Fed members because of the silence period ahead of the decision on January 31st
- Going to the events, a meeting among Foreign Relations Ministers of the Eurozone will be held to evaluate a possible naval mission in the Red Sea. Moreover, the first presidential primary elections in the US will be held in the state of New Hampshire
- On the rest of US data, trade balance, durable goods orders, new home sales, personal income & spending, and the PCE deflator (Dec). In other regions, only consumer confidence in the Eurozone; IFO survey in Germany; and inflation in Brazil (Jan)
- In Mexico, figures in coming days include the monthly GDP-proxy IGAE (nov), unemployment rate, trade balance (Dec), and inflation in 1H-Jan
