

S&P Global Ratings affirms Mexico 'BBB' sovereign rating, maintaining a stable outlook

- S&P Global Ratings affirmed Mexico's sovereign long-term foreign currency credit rating at 'BBB' and that in local currency at 'BBB+', with a stable outlook for both
- The rating remains supported by a cautious macroeconomic management and the expectation of a return to low fiscal deficits starting in 2025
- With this, the agency reaffirms its last action, with a relatively similar narrative to its peers. The announcement is in line with our view that the country will remain as 'investment grade' in the short and medium-term

S&P Global Ratings ratifies Mexico's sovereign rating. Yesterday, the agency ratified Mexico's foreign currency long-term sovereign rating at 'BBB', with that in local currency at 'BBB+', in both cases maintaining a stable outlook. The tone is similar to the one expressed by its peers (highlighting the latest evaluation by Fitch Ratings in December). The agency mentions that the rating is supported by cautious macroeconomic management –underpinned by prudent fiscal and monetary policies–, in addition to the economic integration with North America that set the foundations of greater economic resilience. In addition, they also said that they expect a 2025 budget that narrows this year's 5% government deficit. Regarding the electoral process, they stated that "...whatever the outcome of June's elections, the next government will extend Mexico's record of cautious macroeconomic policy execution...". On top of this, they see a continuation of the efforts to take advantage of nearshoring, looking to diversify growth across the country. As usual, the agency outlined the factors that could skew their evaluation higher or lower. Among the former, we highlight an investment boom, higher budgetary flexibility (with a larger tax base), and the mitigation of contingent liabilities from state-owned companies. On the contrary, among the negative ones they noted "...a sharper-than-expected rise in general government debt [...] the risk of extraordinary support to state-owned companies..." as well as "...unexpected setbacks in macroeconomic management or in relations between USMCA partners...". In this backdrop, they see a GDP expansion this year of around 2.2%, with average annual inflation at 4.3%. These conditions would support rate cuts from Banxico. In this sense, we reiterate our view that Mexico will remain an investment-grade country in the short- and medium-term, with responsible macroeconomic policies and a conservative fiscal stance, despite some pending challenges on the horizon.
